

~~But much to their vast disappointment,~~

But much to their vast disappointment, the small, crude crests were still crammed together like crayons in a box, since the lanky, large bird was continuing to swing by his long, slender toes. One courageous, small bird, who had desperately tried to expel his unwanted guest, glowing scarlet in ferocious anger, dug his orange beak into one clawed toe. To his happiness, ~~the~~ the toe released its grip from the slippery wire. Two childerish birds narrowed their pale dishwater green eyes as an idea sparked in their minds. Smirking evilly, they pursued their beaks and started to peck the remaining toes.

One by one, his pointy toes slipped over off his perch. When just a single toe remained, the childerish, relentless birds' fate flashed before their emerald eyes. They gazed in terror as the bird's last toe coasted off the wire. The vast, tolerant bird settled himself upon the cool, dry,
